I have an API with a contract made that all I do is provide some data through POST, the data then is returned in JSON and I work with it. However I am wondering if this is good design or not. Here is my code: $body = ''; $data = array('productId' =>'someid', 'name' =>'some name'); // I do some business validation and write the body to $body header('Content-type: application/json'); echo json_encode(array('message' => $body)); The problem now is that I want to throw an exception if some unexpected thing happens. For example lets say that there is no product with that productId in DB. If I do this: try { //I do the same business validation and now want to throw an exception } catch (Exception $e) { echo json_encode(array('message' => 'I tried to save a product where there is none!')); exit(); } By doing this, I get an E_NOTICE error, I could just not even save the data to the DB, but now there is still the problem that I get an error message in the browser. Is this a flaw in the way I am thinking of this, or is this the expected output? A: You cannot "throw" an exception in a PHP script. You can either: throw an error in the middle of the script, which propagates the exception up the stack (see set_error_handler()), or return a HTTP status code error response to the browser (see http_response_code()), or log an error somewhere else (outside the script
